Question 4 24

Studying abroad can deeply change how you see the world by exposing you to new cultures and ways of life. As the passage mentions, students often face culture shock, but overcoming these challenges builds resilience and independence. For example, learning to navigate unfamiliar public transportation or adapting to local customs teaches flexibility and open-mindedness. Personally, I found that living abroad helped me appreciate different perspectives and question my own assumptions. It made me more empathetic and curious about global issues, ultimately shaping me into a more thoughtful and culturally aware person.

Studying abroad can help you see the world in a new way. At first, it may be hard to live in a new country. You might feel lonely or confused. But as you make friends and learn about the culture, you feel better. You also learn how to do things by yourself, like cooking or finding your way. I think studying abroad is a good chance to grow. When I visited another country, I saw how people live differently. It helped me understand and respect other cultures more.
